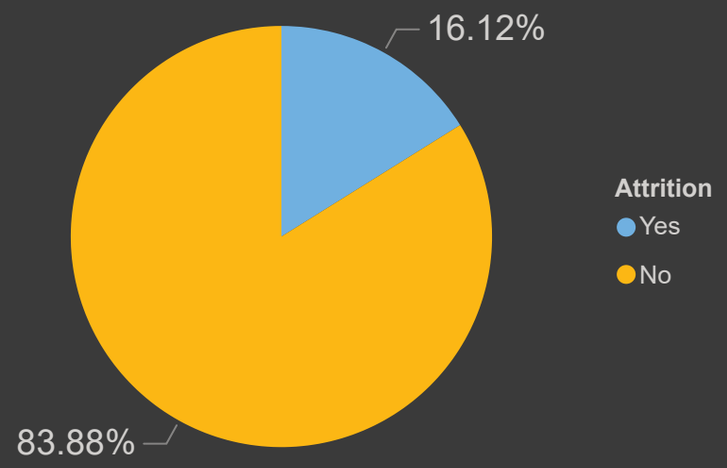
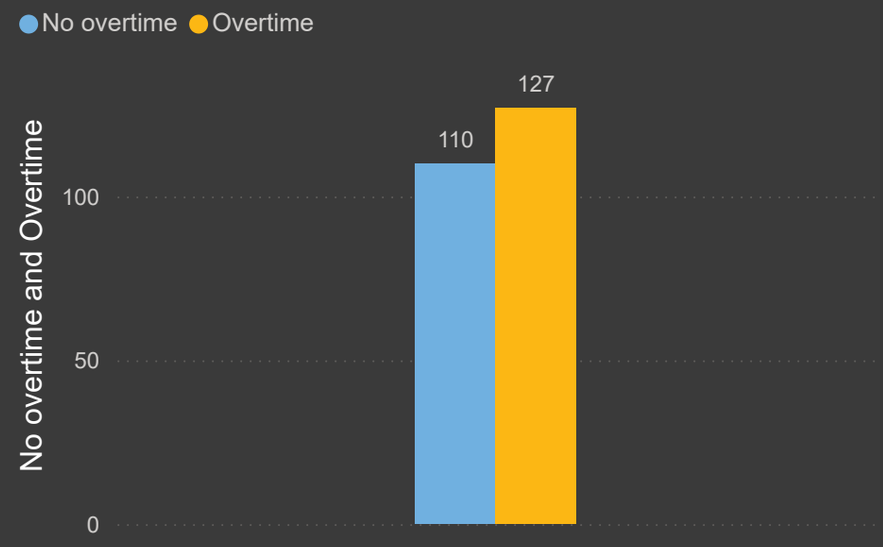
Is employee attrition higher among employees who work overtime compared to those who do not?

Number of Former vs Current Employees



Number of Former Extended-Hour and Regular-Hours Employees



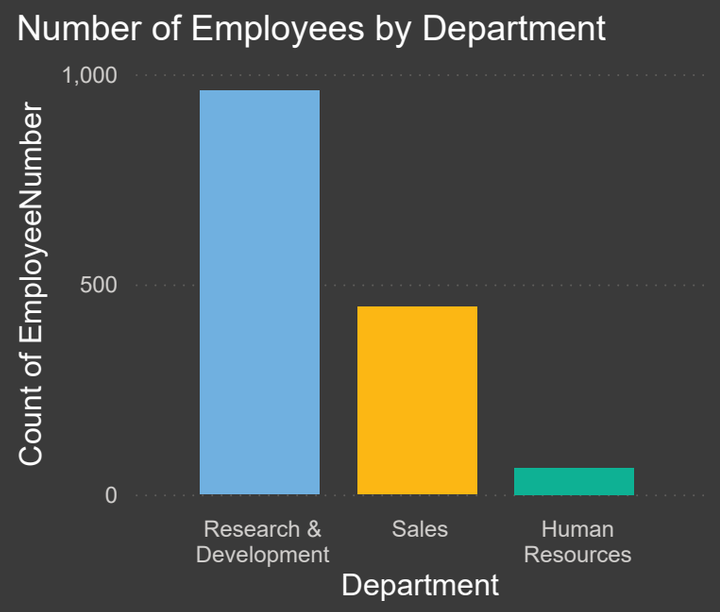
237

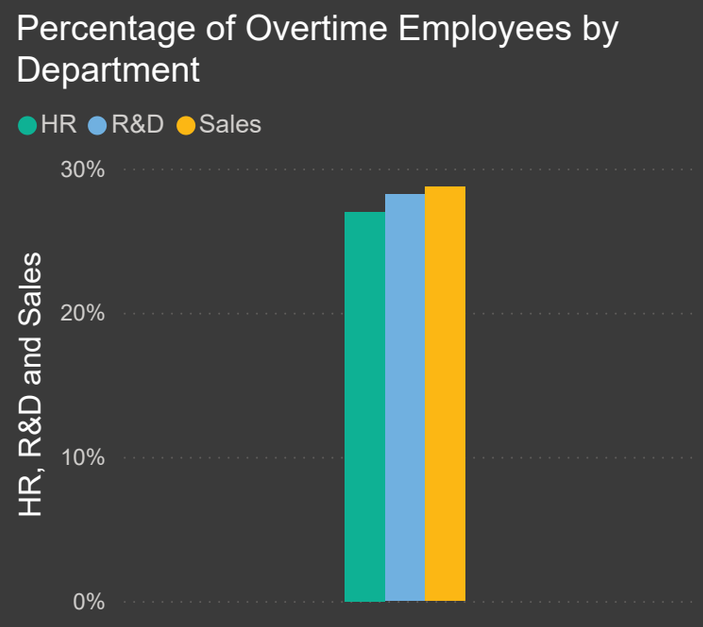
Number of Former Employees

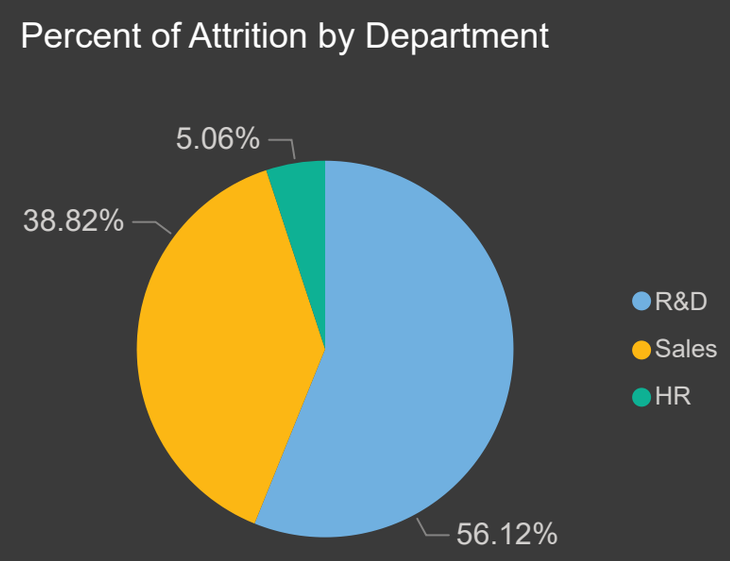
Rate of employee attrition is 15.45% higher among overtime-workers compared to standard-schedule employees.

Created by: Alrayyan Alshukaili

The Research and Development department has the largest workforce. Although the proportion of employees working overtime is relatively consistent across departments, R&D accounts for 56.12% of total employee attrition.



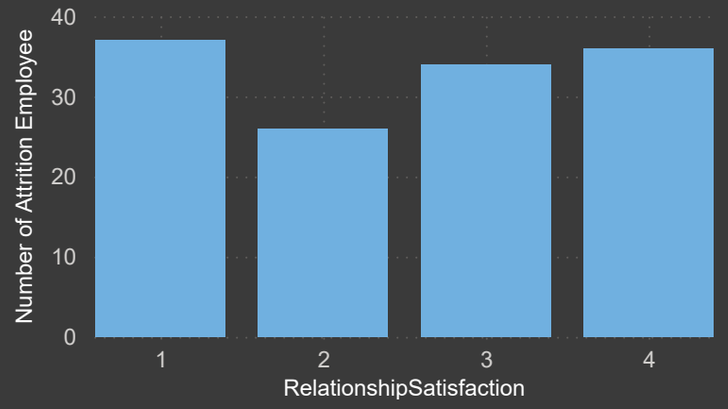




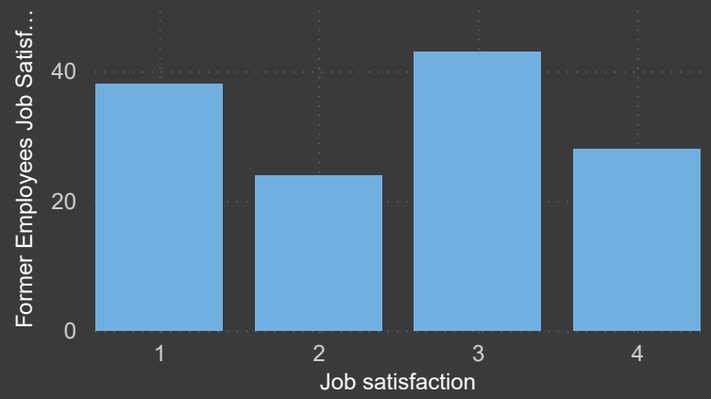
Created by: Alrayyan Alshukaili

*1= Low, 2= Medium, 3= High, 4= Very High

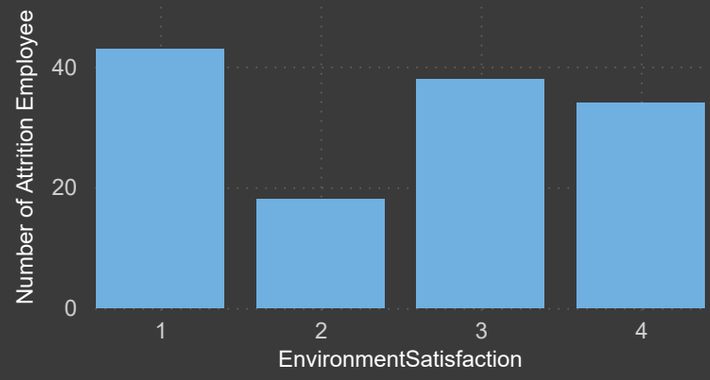
Job Satisfaction Scores in former R&D Employees



Relationship Satisfaction Scores in Former R&D Employees



Environment Satisfaction Scores in Former R&D Employees



28.57%
Low Job Satisfaction

28.57%
Low Relationship Satisfaction

32.33%
Low Environment satisfaction

Among former employees in the Research and Development department, 28.57% reported low levels of relationship and overall job satisfaction, while 32.33% experienced low satisfaction with the work environment during their period of employment.

Created by: Alrayyan Alshukaili

Conclusion:

- Working overtime increases job attrition by 15.45%.
- Job attrition was in the Research and Development department is 56.12% higher
- Strongly associated with 28.57% - 32.33% of former employees expressing dissatisfaction with the work environment, their relationships with colleagues, and their overall job satisfaction.

Recommendation:

Prioritize reducing excessive overtime, and cultivate a positive work environment by promoting strong coworker relationships and recognizing employee contributions, with the goal of lowering employee turnover.

Created by: Alrayyan Alshukaili